Book Description:

Drs. Marc Lubin and Jed Yalof provide a roadmap to self-supervision.

Grounded in psychodynamic literature, Self-Supervision: Psychodynamic Strategies provides teachers, supervisors, and students with a methodology and instructional vignettes that support a deeper understanding of the therapeutic relationship through various self-observational strategies, including notetaking, dreams, free associations, recall of memories, and technology.

These techniques, along with understanding the impact of the supervisory introject; transference along with understanding the impact of the supervisory introject; transference, countertransference, and projective identifications in supervision; the supervisory framework; human diversity; and an approach to validating the success of self-supervisory activity, help make accessible different thoughts and feelings that might otherwise escape supervisory attention, and self-reflection. The methods and processes of self-supervision allow for the continuity of an internalized self-supervisory model as part of life-long learning.
